Dr. Deborah Prothrow-Stith is a nationally recognized author and an eminent public health leader. As an emergency room physician in inner-city Boston, Dr. Prothrow-Stith saw firsthand the carnage of youth and gang violence. She advocated for prevention, not merely "stitching people up and sending them out." She broke new ground to have youth violence defined as a public health problem and created a social movement to prevent violence that has had an impact on Boston and the nation.

A pioneer and innovator, Dr. Prothrow-Stith developed 21st century programs like the critically acclaimed Partnerships for Preventing Violence, a satellite broadcast training series. She also worked on important research initiatives funded by NIH-National Center for Minority Health and Health Disparities with both Florida A & M University and the University of Massachusetts. Additionally, as a chief spokesperson for a national movement to prevent violence and a frequent speaker in national media and public forums, Dr. Prothrow-Stith developed and wrote The Violence Prevention Curriculum for Adolescents.

Dr. Prothrow-Stith is also the acclaimed author of Deadly Consequences, the first book to present the public health perspective on violence to a mass audience. She has authored and/or co-authored over 80 publications on medical and public health issues. She and co-author Howard Spivak, M.D. offer a blue print for community-based violence prevention work in their book, Murder is No Accident, and a guide for parents of girls in their book Sugar and Spice and No Longer Nice.
